

Study Materials for: Could Your Candidate Shoot Someone on 5th Avenue And Not Lose Votes? Identifying “Lines in the Sand” in Ingroup Candidate Transgressions

Before completing the 70 trials, participants completed a brief demographics section. Demographic questions were put first in the survey so that participants who identified as Republican would only see scenarios where Republican candidates transgressed, and participants who identified as Democrat would only see scenarios where Democratic candidates transgressed. In order to achieve this (i.e., participants only reading about scenarios in which the ingroup transgressed), display logic and piped-text were used in Qualtrics.

Introduction:

Hello! Welcome to the study. Below are the directions for the study task:

Deciding who to vote for in major political elections is often not easy. Sometimes both candidates are appealing, and other times both candidates have major flaws. When both candidates possess flaws, we have to weigh the cost and benefits between the two options, and choose the candidate that is overall the best (or least worst).

In the following section you will be presented with 70 'candidate conundrums'. A candidate conundrum is a circumstance with two qualities: (1) It involves a candidate who you favor, but (2) That candidate has done something wrong; specifically, the candidate has committed some sort of transgression in which they have violated a social norm, an ethical moral or principle, or law.

Page Break

You will be presented with 60 candidate conundrums. Each conundrum will have two candidates. The first candidate will be from the political party you oppose, while the other candidate will be from the party you support. However, the candidate from your party will have committed a transgression, and you will have to determine whether this flaw can be overlooked when deciding who to vote for.

Page Break

The purpose of this study is very transparent: We want to know how bad transgressions have to be for you to consider voting for a candidate that is not in your party. Many of the scenarios will appear similar, and it will often be difficult to make a decision. Some will seem very bad to you, whereas others will seem small and relatively unimportant. Therefore, we ask for your patience and honesty when going through these scenarios.

The task: Each candidate conundrum is an important election that will determine whether the Democrats or Republicans gain control of the House of Representatives.

For each conundrum, your candidate will have committed some level of transgression. Rather than thinking about the technicalities of the transgression, just think "would I still vote for someone who did this?"

You can assume the other candidate has not committed any crime or transgression, and has a platform representative of the average candidate in their party.

Page Break

One last note: Candidates will be referred to as "they" in order to remain gender neutral. For this study, we are not testing how gender impacts perceptions.

Page Break

Great! The instructions are complete. Are you ready to begin the scenarios? Remember there are quite a few, but we really appreciate and value your patience!

Page Break

Below is the format for all 70 transgression trials. After reading the transgression information, participants then chose to vote for the Republican or Democratic candidate. The presentation of transgressions was randomized.

Transgression Trial Section

Who do you vote for?

*Remember, this is an important election that will determine whether Republicans or Democrats gain majority of the House.

There is a potential concern about the REPUBLICAN/DEMOCRATIC candidate: They planted a bomb in a public building. The bomb exploded and 20 people were killed.

Which candidate would you choose to vote for, the Democratic candidate, or the Republican candidate?

Answer options:

- Democratic candidate
- Republican candidate
